The attendance was large, including many prominent politicians from adjoining counties. Charles R. McKinney was permanent chairman and the following ticket was nominated: For representative, O. P. Lewis; clerk, Frye Bryant; auditor, James T. Bell; treasurer, Harry Randolph; recorder, Guy Spinning; sheriff, John Hardesty; coroner, Dr. Eugene Rice; commissioners, James H. Brown and George Law. Senator Charles W. Fairbanks was introduced at the close of the convention and spoke eloquently for an hour. He reviewed the administrative achievements of the Republican party since 1897 and showed the fallacy of Democratic doctrines. He said Republicans first think and then act, while the Democratic leaders first act and do their thinking afterwards, and proved the statement from the record of recent campaigns. The cries of anti-imperialism and free silver, so vehemently uttered in 1900 and 1896, are not heard in the present campaign, he said. The stirring events and the results of the Spanish-American war were presented to show the wisdom and courage of Republican politics. His eulogy of William McKinley gave the martyred President a place beside Washington and Lincoln. The isthmian canal project was clearly explained and the importance of the great scheme now under exclusive control of this government was emphasized. Representative Charles B. Landis followed in a brief speech. The platform follows: "The Repulicans of Fountain county in convention assembled, indorse with unqual-
